

Forging Identities: Gender, Communities, And The State In India

This volume challenges the assumption that Muslims in India constitute a homogeneous community, with specific characteristics deriving from Islam. Instead, it locates the community within the social, economic, and political developments that have taken place in the subcontinent, pre- and post-Independence, in order to examine how exactly the delineation of minority identity takes place. The implications of this process for women are quite clear: social reality is gendered, yet women's attempts to assert their rights have been constrained by the pressures of communal politics. The domain of cultural politics, moreover, has generated ideologies that have subordinated gender equality to minority identity. Despite a surge in feminist literature, there are only a few studies that explore the link between gender and religious community or analyze the integration of women into communitarian processes. Through an examination of history, law, politics, work, and culture, this collection looks at how the construction of community identity has affected Muslim women in India, the processes by which such identities are constructed, and how the question of gender and community identity intersects with the state's discourse on equality and secularism. The contributors offer readers a subtle understanding of the complex interaction of women's multiple identities with the dynamics of state policy, cultural nationalism, and identity politics.

This volume challenges the assumption that Muslims in India constitute a homogeneous community, with specific characteristics deriving from Islam. Instead, it locates the community within the social, economic, and political developments that have taken place in the subcontinent, pre- and post-Independence, in order to examine how exactly the delineation of minority identity takes place. The implications of this process for women are quite clear: social reality is gendered, yet women's attempts to assert their rights have been constrained by the pressures of communal politics. The domain of cultural politics, moreover, has generated ideologies that have subordinated gender equality to minority identity. Despite a surge in feminist literature, there are only a few studies that explore the link between gender and religious community or analyze the integration of women into communitarian processes. Through an examination of history, law, politics, work, and culture, this collection looks at how the construction of community identity has affected Muslim women in India, the processes by which such identities are constructed, and how the question of gender and community identity intersects with the state's discourse on equality and secularism. The contributors offer readers a subtle understanding of the complex interaction of women's multiple identities with the dynamics of state policy, cultural nationalism, and identity politics.

Book reviews and notices : ZOYA HASAN, ed., Forging identities: Gender, communities and the state. New Delhi: Kali for Women, 1994. xxiv + 264 pp. Notes in the Indian context. Forging Identities: Gender, Communities, and the State in India Law and Gender Inequality: The Politics of Women's Rights in India Bibliography: Includes bibliographical references and index. Contents. Introduction : contextualising gender and identity in contemporary India / Zoya Hasan Read Forging Identities: Gender, Communities, And The State In India book reviews & author details and more at . Free delivery on qualified orders. Forging identities : gender, communities, and the state /? edited by Zoya Hasan. Muslim women in British India /? Barbara D. Metcalf Gender and the politics In the Indian context. Notes. Includes bibliographical references and index. Subjects, Muslim women -- India. Other authors/contributors, Hasan, Zoya, 1947- This volume challenges the assumption that Muslims in India constitute a homogeneous community, with specific characteristics deriving from Islam. Instead This volume challenges the assumption that Muslims in India constitute a homogenous community, with specific characteristics deriving from Islam. Instead it Forging Identities: Gender, Communities and the State In India. ZOYA HASAN. ed. Boulder: Westview Press, 1994. xxiv. 264 pp., notes, index. This volume challenges the assumption that Muslims in India constitute a homogenous community, with specific characteristics deriving from Islam. Instead it Two of the authors included in this collection. (aside from Peacock) are anthropologists without specific religious orientations. Allyn Maclean. Stearman has Forging identities : gender, communities, and the state in India / edited by Zoya Introduction: Contextualising Gender and Identity in Contemporary India Title, Forging Identities: Gender, Communities, And The State In India (Paperback). Author, Zoya Hasan. Publisher, Westview Press. ISBN, 9780813323336.