Of course it often happened that the boys were both at the place together,--John working at his bench and Benny writing on the board. One day, when Benny came to his board, he found a drawing on it as well as some writing. The drawing was a picture of his ladder, and the writing was the word ladder. Benny had never seen the word ladder before, but he had written and learned so many words, and he knew now so many of the letters, that he read ladder without any difficulty, though I imagine he may have been considerably assisted by the picture of the object adjoining. He however at once copied the whole, making a drawing of the ladder, and also writing the word. Then of course he rubbed out the work which John had done, and left his own only on the board. It happened that his mother came out that way that afternoon, with Bridget, to look after something in the swing-room beyond, and when she saw what was on the board, she said,--Ah, there is some of Johns drawing. He has done it pretty well. Oh no, Mrs. Gay, said Bridget; thats Bennys work. I saw him do it. He did not write that word, did he? asked Mrs. Gay. Yes, mam, said Bridget. I saw him write it, from a copy that John set him. I am surprised, said Mrs. Gay. John seems to be not only teaching him his letters, but also teaching him to write. CHAPTER X. THE HANDCART. Benny did not wait until he had quite learned all the letters before he finished Lulys cards. He wrote a few of the last ones from copies which John set him, without being entirely certain in respect to the names of them. When they were all made, John painted them. The...
