In 1996, Sonny Craig unveiled a new creation model in a thesis reviewed by Dr. John Munday, Math and Science Professor of Regent University and Robert Bradshaw, an expert historian on the subject of Christian Creationism. Bradshaw stated that the model was a new idea in creationist thought. Presuppositional Creationism is the first creation model to propose dysteleology as the center of a creation model. Dysteleology is seeing those aspects of the creation which defy order and design such as black holes, galaxies colliding together, planet-killing comets, etc. The universe, with the exception of Earths biosphere, is a deadly place, contrary to the concept of the very good creation proposed in scripture. Craig proposes that evolution is not something to be debunked but is in all actuality a condition of the universe brought on by The Fall. God therefore is not the source of evolution, the Curse of Sin and the Ground is the mechanism (death, decay, survival of the species through adaptation and mutation) of evolution, which requires an eschatology that the creation be redeemed/recreated, just as man needs redemption/recreation in the Age to Come. Until then nature must care for itself, having lost its caretaker mankind who was to tend the garden of God and exercise dominion according to Gen 1:28. The universe is now ruled by the laws of physics in a fallen state (what the Bible terms as thorns and thistles, corruption or as science calls it, the Second Law of Thermodynamics and Entropy). This places Genesis and all creation models firmly in the realm of theology and eschatology, not a true scientific method as is claimed by other creationist models that base their arguments in negative argumentation of evolutionary biology. Only after an eschatological recreation can the physical mechanisms of nature be matched to the biblical account. Craig proposes that the four major models of Creationism (Theistic Evolution, Progressive Creationism, Young-Earth Creationism and Intelligent Design) fail to correctly interpret biblical theology and the natural sciences and their attempts at falsification of evolutionary science is counter-productive. The Hypothetical Question is the second part of Craigs model which addresses the problem of evil and free-will (a theodicy) and reveals a practical methodology that closely matches the scientific method (methodological naturalism) and theoretical physics. It does so by asking the question, Would Christ still have incarnated, had Adam chose to OBEY, rather than sin? This theological question has been declared a heresy and banned from discussion in both Catholicism and Protestantism since the 13th century when Duns Scotus first proposed it. Craig expands that to ask what would the universe, history, and physics look like in a world where there was no sin, no curse? The ideas that flow from that question are how science today does it work, in particular in theoretical and particle physics and the new experiments on the God Particle (the Higgs-Boson particle). Theorizing from this perspective how would things have worked in an unfallen universe? inspires one to find practical methods of rolling back the Curse of Sin and the Ground. An examples would be the hydrogen powered car (expels water, not fossil fuels pollutants), as well as other Green science. This publication is a pamphlet overview, 54 pages, and is only intended as a priority piece as well as an overview. Since its publication in 1996, more and more Christians have begun to call themselves Presuppositional Creationists. Before his thesis publication in 1996, the two concepts were alien to Christian creationism. Attempts to use the term presuppositional creationism plagiarize merely the title, claiming it is the presuppositions of evolutionary science that are illegitimate while those creationists continue their bad science and theology.
