

Voiceover: A Radio Presenters Brush With Vocal Cancer (High Grade Dysphonia)

Amazons Latest True Story You May Have Cancer I can remember those words, they didnt just vibrate my eardrum, they hit me like a freight train coming out of a tunnel. Here I was, a radio presenter and a salesman. For 25+ years I had relied on my voice not just for conversing with family and the usual day to day running of my life, but for my entire identity, my profession and my earning capacity. Up until this point in my life it had served me well. Now I was being told I may have throat cancer. The dread that the statement above created made its way through my soul like a knife through butter and simply chilled me to the bone. As I sat in the hospital waiting room I was surrounded by people with manufactured voice boxes. They either had some kind of fleshy button to press or one of those electronic voice things they hold to their throat. Now I was scared, how does one go about beating cancer? What really hit home was the mere mention of the C word; Cancer. When you have a problem with your voice then everyone is thinking about it but they skirt around it thinking that if you say Vocal Cancer it could make it real. So of course everyone tries to say other things something not quite right is one a little cell change is another. But Cancer is the big one isnt it. Nothing prepares you for the first time you hear your doctor say it to you. I explored so called new age healing therapies, its a step often taken when you are faced with surgery that is irreversable, The results were interesting to say the least. Full details of my journey from Radio Presenter and salesman to Author and consultant are within these pages. High Grade Dysphonia That; what they called it, this thing I had, and another word was Leukoplakia. The first half of the word was enough - Leuk - as in Leukemia. What was I to think?
